Begun in 1724, The Carpenters' Company is the oldest extant trade guild in America. Its founding vision was to provide the master builders of the Philadelphia area with training in the architectural disciplines at a time when structural innovation in design was mostly by trial and error. There have been approximately 900 members elected to The Carpenters' Company since 1724. One of the Company's main purposes today is to maintain Carpenters' Hall, considered by some to be the most historic building in Philadelphia, and to provide scholarships for college students interested in architecture, engineering and construction.
